

Are You “Normal”?

“Are these blues I feel normal?” “Should I get help?”

We get many questions on the “what’s normal” theme when it comes to depression and mental health: Is it normal to feel this depressed? Do I drink too much? Why do I get so angry? Everyone has times when their usual coping mechanisms fail. And as the seasons change from fall to winter, many people suffer from Seasonal Affective Disorder, or S.A.D. But when symptoms persist, it’s time to reach out for help.

Signs that might indicate a need for help include:

Mood swings • Dramatic highs and lows • Confused thinking • Feeling sad, “empty,” hopeless, irritable, anxious or guilty • Problems with concentration, memory, or logical thought • Being frequently suspicious, irritable, or anxious • Withdrawal from social contact • Loss of interest in favorite activities • Dramatic changes in sleeping or eating patterns • Decline in personal care • Seeing or hearing things • Substance abuse • Thoughts of suicide or suicide attempts.

Our online Emotional Wellbeing resources let you confidentially explore anxiety, depression, stress and other mental health issues. You can also take self-assessments and quizzes. If you can’t seem to shake the depression or anxiety you feel, talk to a physician or a therapist to explore the cause of your feelings of depression and what alternate treatments are available. Remember, you can call to speak to your EAP counselor day or night! 800.252.4555

Breast Cancer Awareness

Nearly a quarter of a million U.S. women get breast cancer each year and more than 40,000 women die from the disease. The National Breast Cancer Foundation has a new free guide, Know the Symptoms, with a checklist of symptoms to help you know what to look for during a self-exam.
